Ditt är en äkta, fullständig återbudspak.rar Where to download metacad v7?Q: Python: With open(), should I close the file before it has finished writing? I am making a program that opens a file, reads its contents and then does some sort of calculation on the contents and then write's the contents back to that same file. In the process of writing to the file, some lines of text are written and some lines are skipped. So do I need to close the file when I am done with it? ie. open(filename) read_contents(filename) do_calculation() write_contents(filename) or is it okay to just leave the file open? A: Better to keep the file open until it's time to close. With a lot of the built-in library classes, you can do "autoclosing" for you. For example, string objects have the __del__ method for this, which gets called when the object is garbage collected. Here's some code that does some actions, and then writes some information to a file: s='abc' try: for i in xrange(2): do_action(s) finally: # do the cleanup s.__del__() Using a context manager will make sure all operations done by the code block are done with the file open (no matter where you are in the
